On the death of Archbishop Tenison the subject was revived, and in 1717 Elihu Yale, Esq., offered 100 guineas for the purchase and building of a house for the Society, to contain a Chapel, a Charity School, and a Library, and £10 per annum towards repairing the house and maintaining the school, also books for the Library, and further help in raising a sufficient fund. Mr. Yale paid the 100 guineas in 1718, and offered a loan of £500. Other subscriptions were received, and it was proposed to apply to the King for the grant of a site in the Savoy or elsewhere [5]. Not until 1726 however was a change made, and then a house was taken in Warwick Court, Warwick Square [6]. The office arrangements could not have been satisfactory, for in 1738 the Treasurers were removing from Lime Street, and the Society's books &c. and a picture of General Codrington then found their way to Warwick Court [and the picture since to a place unknown] [7]. On the expiration of the lease in 1741, the Secretary lent the Preacher's lodgings in Charterhouse for the Committee, and a house adjoining the same was rented for the books and papers [8].

From this date the official addresses of the Chief Secretaries (which have probably varied with their other appointments) have been as follows: 1741-60, Charterhouse; 1761-4, Bartlett's Buildings, Holborn; 1765-71, Abingdon Street, Westminster; 1772-7, St. Ann's, Westminster; 1778-86, Hatton Garden; 1787-1817, 53 Gower Street, Bedford Square; 1818-31, St. Martin's Library, 42 Castle Street, Leicester Square; from about 1832 to the present time the offices are given below [9].

The Report for 1827 states that "before the year 1822 the Society had no public office" [10]. This was not correct, but from that date a regular office may be said to have been maintained, viz.:—1822-4, 12 Carlton Chambers, Regent Street; 1824-35, 77 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields (built by the Society); 1835-9, 4 Trafalgar Square; 1840-66, 79 Pall Mall; Midsummer 1866 to March 1871* 5 Park Place, St. James's Street; March 1871 to the present time, 19 Delahay Street, Westminster (formerly 20 Duke Street—see p. 943) [11]. The last (the first freehold office of the Society), was formally opened on April 20, 1871; it includes a suitable Chapel, in which a daily service is maintained at 10 A.M.; and, under licence from the Bishop of London, the Holy Communion has been repeatedly celebrated there on the departure of Missionaries to their fields of labour [12].

SECRETARIES.

The Society's Charter provides that there shall be one Secretary. This office has been filled by the following persons, viz.:— John Chamberlain, Esq., first elected 1701; W. Taylor, Esq., 1712; Rev. Dr. D. Humphreys, 1716; Rev. Dr. P. Bearcroft, 1739; Rev. Dr. D. Burton, 1761; Rev. Dr. Hind, 1773; Rev. Dr. W. Morice, 1778; Rev. A. Hamilton, M.A., 1819; Rev. A. M. Campbell, M.A., 1833; Rev. Ernest Hawkins, M.A., 1843; Rev. W. T. Bullock, M.A., 1865; Rev. H. W. Tucker, M.A., 1879. (Acting Secretary, Rev. E. P. Sketchley, M.A., 1901.)

On the resignation of the Rev. Prebendary Tucker in 1901, the selection of his successor was delegated by the Standing Committee to an Episcopal Committee consisting of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Bath and Wells, and Newcastle, on whose recommendation, and that of the Standing Committee, the Right Rev. H. H. Montgomery, D.D., Bishop of Tasmania, was elected at a special meeting of the Society summoned by the President and held at the Society's Office on July 26, 1901 [13].

CHAPTER CIII.

THE MISSIONARIES OF THE SOCIETY.

"The most conspicuous mark of the prudent care of the Society has been exhibited in the choice of their Missionaries. If they have not all proved equally unexceptionable, every possible precaution has been used, to admit none of evil report. The indispensable Qualifications, annexed to the Annual Abstract of our Proceedings, might serve to evince this, had not the Missionaries themselves, during the last seven or eight years, by their conduct and their sufferings, borne abundant testimony to the attention and discernment of the Society. The characters of those Worthies will entitle them to a lasting Memorial in some future impartial history of the late events in that country [America]. Their firm perseverance in their duty, amidst temptations, menaces, and in some cases cruelties, would have distinguished them as meritorious men in better times. In the present age, when persecution has tried the constancy of very few Sufferers for Conscience here, so many, in one cause, argue a larger portion of disinterested virtue, still existing somewhere among mankind, than a severe observer of the world might have been disposed to admit." [Sermon of Bishop Butler of Oxford, before the Society, 1784 [1].]

THE first step of the Society to obtain Missionaries was taken in January and February 1702 through the Episcopal Members and the Archdeacons, who were asked to make known the want and invite applications for transmission to the Society. A "Request concerning fit persons to be sent abroad" was printed and circulated, desiring

"that all Persons, who shall Recommend any to that Purpose, will testify their Knowledge as to the following Particulars, viz.—I. The Age of the Person. II. His condition of Life, whether Single or Married. III. His temper. IV. His Prudence. V. His Learning. VI. His Sober and Pious Conversation. VII. His Zeal for the Christian Religion, and Diligence in his Holy Calling. VIII. His affection to the present Government, and IX. His Conformity to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England."

It was added that the "Society do request and earnestly beseech all Persons concerned, That they recommend no Man out of Favour or Affection, or any other Worldly Consideration; but with a sincere Regard to the Honour of Almighty God and our Blessed Saviour, as they tender the Interest of the Christian Religion, and the Good of Men's Souls" [2].

The Testimonials to the "indispensable qualifications" of a candidate were to be signed by his Diocesan, or where that was not practicable, by at least three other members of the Communion of the Church of England known to the Society. In the examination of candidates special regard was had as to their reading, preaching, and pronunciation, which were submitted to a practical test [2a]. The salary ordinarily allowed to a Missionary in the early days was £50 a year, with a Mission Library of the value of £10 and £5 for books for free distribution among his parishioners [3]. The remainder of his support was met from local sources. Missionaries to the heathen—the negroes and Indians—were necessarily allowed a larger stipend from the Society [4]. In 1706 the following Instructions for the Clergy and the Schoolmasters were printed. In the words of Anderson (Hist. Col. Church, III. p. 153), "They embrace every particular which could possibly be required for the guidance of the Missionaries, and describe each with a faithful simplicity, and affectionate and prudent care, which it seems impossible to surpass."

"INSTRUCTIONS for the Clergy employed by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

"Upon their Admission by the Society.

"I. THAT, from the Time of their Admission, they lodge not in any Publick House; but at some Bookseller's, or in other private and reputable Families, till they shall be otherwise accommodated by the Society.

"II. That till they can have a convenient Passage, they employ their Time usefully; in Reading Prayers, and Preaching, as they have Opportunity; in hearing others Read and Preach; or in such Studies as may tend to fit them for their Employment.

"III. That they constantly attend the Standing Committee of this Society, at the Secretary's, and observe their Directions.

"IV. That before their Departure they wait upon his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, their Metropolitan, and upon the Lord Bishop of London, their Diocesan, to receive their Paternal Benediction and Instructions.

"Upon their going on Board the Ship designed for their Passage.

"I. THAT they demean themselves not only inoffensively and prudently, but so as to become remarkable Examples of Piety and Virtue to the Ship's Company.

"II. That whether they be Chaplains* in the Ships, or only Passengers, they

Mr. Urmston of Moscow of the ill-usage of himself and others by sea Captains [see also p. 12], the Society in 1704 made a representation to its President on the subject, and drew up a letter of recommendation to the Masters of those Ships conveying its Missionaries [5a].

endeavour to prevail with the Captain or Commander, to have Morning and Evening Prayer said daily; as also Preaching and Catechizing every Lord's Day.

"III. That throughout their Passage they Instruct, Exhort, Admonish, and Reprove, as they have occasion and opportunity, with such Seriousness and Prudence, as may gain them Reputation and Authority.

"Upon their Arrival in the Country whither they shall be sent.

"First, With Respect to themselves.

"I. THAT they always keep in their View the great Design of their Undertaking, viz. To promote the Glory of Almighty God, and the Salvation of Men, by Propagating the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour.

"II. That they often consider the Qualifications requisite for those who would effectually promote this Design, viz. A sound Knowledge and hearty Belief of the Christian Religion; an Apostolical Zeal, tempered with Prudence, Humility, Meekness and Patience; a fervent Charity towards the Souls of Men; and finally, that Temperance, Fortitude, and Constancy, which become good Soldiers of Jesus Christ.

"III. That in order to the obtaining and preserving the said Qualifications, they do very frequently in their Retirements offer up fervent Prayers to Almighty God for his Direction and Assistance; converse much with the Holy Scriptures; seriously reflect upon their Ordination Vows; and consider the Account which they are to render to the great Shepherd and Bishop of our Souls at the last Day.

"IV. That they acquaint themselves thoroughly with the Doctrine of the Church of England, as contained in the Articles and Homilies; its Worship and Discipline, and Rules for Behaviour of the Clergy, as contained in the Liturgy and Canons; and that they approve themselves accordingly, as genuine Missionaries from this Church.

"V. That they endeavour to make themselves Masters in those Controversies which are necessary to be understood, in order to the Preserving their Flock from the Attempts of such Gainsayers as are mixed among them.

"VI. That in their outward Behaviour they be circumspect and unblameable, giving no Offence either in Word or Deed; that their ordinary Discourse be grave and edifying; their Apparel decent, and proper for Clergymen; and that in their whole Conversation they be Instances and Patterns of the Christian Life.

"VII. That they do not board in, or frequent Publick-houses, or lodge in Families of evil Fame; that they wholly abstain from Gaming, and all such Pastimes; and converse not familiarly with lewd or prophane Persons, otherwise than in order to reprove, admonish, and reclaim them.

"VIII. That in whatsoever Family they shall lodge, they persuade them to join with them in daily Prayer Morning and Evening.

"IX. That they be not nice about Meats and Drinks, nor immoderately careful about their Entertainment in the Places where they shall sojourn; but contented with what Health requires, and the Place easily affords.

"X. That as they be frugal, in Opposition to Luxury, so they avoid all Appearance of Covetousness, and recommend themselves, according to their Abilities, by the prudent Exercise of Liberality and Charity.

"XI. That they take special Care to give no Offence to the Civil Government, by intermeddling in Affairs not relating to their own Calling and Function.

"XII. That, avoiding all Names of Distinction, they endeavour to preserve a Christian Agreement and Union one with another, as a Body of Brethren of one and the same Church, united under the Superior Episcopal Order, and all engaged in the same great Design of Propagating the Gospel; and to this End, keeping up a Brotherly Correspondence, by meeting together at certain Times, as shall be most convenient, for mutual Advice and Assistance.

"Secondly, With respect to their Parochial Cure.

"I. THAT they conscientiously observe the Rules of our Liturgy, in the Performance of all the Offices of their Ministry.

"II. That, besides the stated Service appointed for Sundays and Holidays, they do, as far as they shall find it practicable, publicly read the daily Morning and Evening Service, and decline no fair Opportunity of Preaching to such as may be occasionally met together from remote and distant Parts.

"III. That they perform every Part of Divine Service with that Seriousness and Decency, that may recommend their Ministrations to their Flock, and excite a Spirit of Devotion in them.

"IV. That the chief Subjects of their Sermons be the great Fundamental Principles of Christianity, and the Duties of a sober, righteous, and godly Life, as resulting from those Principles.

"V. That they particularly preach against those Vices which they shall observe to be most predominant in the Places of their Residence.

"VI. That they carefully instruct the People concerning the Nature and Use of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, as the peculiar Institutions of Christ, Pledges of Communion with Him, and Means of deriving Grace from Him.

"VII. That they duly consider the Qualifications of those adult Persons to whom they administer Baptism; and of those likewise whom they admit to the Lord's Supper; according to the Directions of the Rubricks in our Liturgy.

"VIII. That they take special Care to lay a good Foundation for all their other Ministrations, by Catechizing those under their Care, whether Children, or other ignorant Persons, explaining the Catechism to them in the most easy and familiar Manner.

"IX. That in their instructing *Heathens and Infidels, they begin with the Principles of Natural Religion, appealing to their Reason and Conscience; and thence proceed to shew them the Necessity of Revelation, and the Certainty of that contained in the Holy Scriptures, by the plainest and most obvious Arguments.

"X. That they frequently visit their respective Parishioners; those of our own Communion, to keep them steady in the Profession and Practice of Religion, as taught in the Church of England; those that oppose us, or dissent from us, to convince and reclaim them with a Spirit of Meekness and Gentleness.

"XI. That those, whose Parishes shall be of large Extent, shall, as they have Opportunity and Convenience, officiate in the several Parts thereof, so that all the Inhabitants may by Turns partake of their Ministrations; and that such as shall be appointed to officiate in several Places shall reside sometimes at one, sometimes at another of those Places, as the Necessities of the People shall require.

"XII. That they shall, to the best of their Judgments, distribute those small Tracts given by the Society for that Purpose, amongst such of their Parishioners as shall want them most, and appear likely to make the best Use of them; and that such useful Books, of which they have not a sufficient Number to give, they be ready to lend to those who will be most careful in reading and restoring them.

"XIII. That they encourage the setting up of Schools for the teaching of Children; and particularly by the Widows of such Clergymen as shall die in those Countries, if they be found capable of that Employment.

"XIV. That each of them keep a Register of his Parishioners' Names, Profession of Religion, Baptism, &c. according to the Scheme annexed, No. I for his own Satisfaction, and the Benefit of the People.

"Thirdly, With respect to the Society.

"I. THAT each of them keep a constant and regular Correspondence with the Society, by their Secretary.

"II. That they send every six Months an Account of the State of their respective Parishes, according to the Scheme annexed, No. II.

"III. That they communicate what shall be done at the Meetings of the Clergy, when settled, and whatsoever else may concern the Society."

[See also General Instructions to the North American Missionaries in 1735 to promote loyalty, brotherly love, the evangelization of the Indians, and the propagation of the Gospel generally [5b].]

It was hoped that the Colonial Church would derive continuous benefit from two fellowships founded at Jesus College, Oxford, by will of Sir Leolyne Jenkyns, November 9, 1685, the holders of which were bound to take Holy Orders and afterwards either go to sea as Navy Chaplain if summoned by the Lord High Admiral of England, or if not required for that service then to the Colonies if called upon by the Bishop of London [6]. The election of one Fellow, the Rev. Henry Nicols, B.A., was formally notified to the Society by the College authorities in 1703, and he went out as a Missionary to Chester, Pennsylvania [7]. Since then successive Fellows were allowed to evade their responsibilities until about 1850-2, when the Bishop of London succeeded in restoring the Fellowships to their original purpose, and the Revs. William David, M.A., and John David Jenkins took service in Canada and South Africa respectively [8]. But while the English Universities failed to furnish a due supply of Clergy for foreign service, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales were forward in contributing to the ranks of labourers—"to Ireland we owe several very choice Missionaries," the Report for 1714 stated [9]—and in 1707 and 1711 Bishop Wilson of Sodor and Man submitted to the Society a scheme for a Missionary Training College in the Isle of Man. Want of means prevented the adoption of the scheme, and the Society had to confine its attention to carrying out General Codrington's design for a similar College in Barbados [9a]. It was long however before any Colonial Missionary College came into existence [10], and still longer before any provision existed for the ordination of students out of England. Many candidates came over from America and returned safely, some of them to be the ablest of Missionaries; but many more hesitated to face the long, dangerous, expensive, and perhaps fruitless voyage, which in fact proved fatal to one-fifth of those who ventured on it [11]. People must have been truly "athirst for God" who could—as the inhabitants of Hebron in Connecticut did for twenty years—persevere and at great expense* in sending to England four candidates successively, before they succeeded in obtaining a resident Missionary. The first of these candidates, Mr. Dean (1745), perished at sea while returning. The next, Mr. Colton, died of small-pox within a week after his return (1752). The third, Mr. Usher, was on the return voyage taken prisoner by the French (1757), and died in the Castle of Bayonne of small-pox. The last, Mr. Peters, was taken ill with the same disease in England, but recovered and returned, to the joy of his flock [12]. No wonder then that in 1767, of the 21 churches and congregations in New Jersey, eleven were entirely destitute of a minister, and for the other ten there were only five clergymen available [13]; that in Pennsylvania the case was similar [14], and that the Governor of North Carolina reported to the Society in 1764 that there were then but six clergymen in that province for 29 parishes, each containing a whole county [15].

The Missionaries took great pains to secure suitable candidates for the ministry, and in 1769, on the representation of the Clergy of New York and New Jersey, it was agreed that those to be recommended from those parts should have received a collegiate education and obtained from the President of the College a certificate of moral and intellectual fitness [16]. This raising of the standard must have further reduced the supply had it not been for the foundation of King's (now Columbia) College, New York, in 1754 [p. 775]. Up to that time there was no Church Seminary in the northern colonies of America, and those who sought education in the colleges under the control of Dissenters had in some instances "to submit to a fine as often as they attended the worship of the Church of England, communicants only excepted, and those only on Sacrament days" [17]. The need of an indigenous ministry for the Colonial Churches has by the Society always been regarded as second only in importance to that of resident Bishops. Gladly therefore the Society lent its aid to the establishment of colleges in Barbados [p. 782] and New York [pp. 775-6], and as opportunity offered, to similar institutions throughout the world [pp. 776-97]. The introduction of Episcopacy enabled this good work to bring forth fruit to perfection, and before the middle of the present century the Society was able to report that the supply of Missionaries for America and the West Indies was no longer principally from the mother country, the establishment of colleges of classical and theological education in all the Provinces of British North America having to a great degree superseded the necessity of sending out clergymen from England:—

"Codrington (Barbados), Windsor, Fredericton, Cobourg, Lennoxville, are now yearly supplying candidates for the ministry, not less qualified by learning and devotion than those educated at home, and better trained for the work of an Evangelist in their own country by being hardened to its climate, and inured to the privations and hardships which belong to new settlements" [18].

Similar results have since been witnessed in Australia and New Zealand, while in Asia and Africa a good supply of Native Missionaries is now assured from the excellent training institutions there [pp. 783b-96].

But though the Colonial Churches in America and the West Indies, in Australia and New Zealand now furnish a large proportion of their own Clergy, and, having become Missionary, themselves are sending evangelists to heathen lands, the combined forces from home and abroad are far from sufficient to gather in the harvest. For in the present age "the field is the world" in a sense never before manifest. The immediate needs of India alone call for hundreds more European Missionaries.

The failure of a scheme for drawing the English "Clergy Orphan School" into the Missionary cause in connection with Bishop's College, Calcutta, has been noticed [p. 475].

With the object of adding to the supply for India the Society in 1852 established Oriental Exhibitions at St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, which have borne good fruit [19]; and on two occasions it offered Missionary Exhibitions† at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge (besides subsidising "Mission Houses"‡ there), but all these, for lack of candidates, were soon discontinued [20].

* The expense of the voyage averaged over £100 in those days.

† In 1859 four Exhibitions of £150 each for two years, and in 1874 two of £80 each [20a].

‡ St. Stephen's, Oxford, and one in Jesus Lane, Cambridge, between 1878-80 [20b].

Under a trust created by Bishop Hobhouse in 1882 and accepted by the Society in 1889 two Missionary studentships have been established at Selwyn College, Cambridge, in connection with the Society and with its assistance [21].

The Day of Intercession instituted in 1872 at the suggestion of the Society [p. 821] has done much to awaken interest in and to kindle zeal for Foreign Missions; if the Society has not participated so fully as other organisations in the increased supply of labourers sent forth from the English Universities, it can but rejoice that God has given His Church grace "with one accord" to make her common supplications unto Him and that he has been pleased to "fulfil" "the desires and petitions of His servants as may be most expedient for them."

In order that the sending forth of Missionaries should henceforth be in form, as it had always been in reality, the act of the chief Bishops of our Church, it was determined in 1846 that no home candidate for Missionary employment should be accepted by the Society without the express approval of a Board of Examiners, to be nominated by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Bishop of London, the three prelates alone empowered under the Act of Parliament to ordain for the Colonies [22]. With respect to candidates educated or resident abroad and there offering themselves for Missionary service, the Society confides in the recommendation of the several Bishops to whom the spiritual rule in their respective Diocese has been committed, and who have all alike authority to "call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard" and are responsible to God for "faithfully and wisely making choice of fit persons to serve in the sacred ministry of the Church." The wisdom and propriety of this practice were confirmed by the President, to whom in 1854 was submitted the question whether he "could advise the Society to constitute . . . similar Boards [as in England] for the examination of Missionary candidates in the several British Colonies, or to leave to the Colonial Bishops the responsibility of recommending well-qualified Missionaries; reserving to the Society, as at present, the right to decide whether any particular candidate shall be placed upon its Missionary list."

In his reply Archbishop Sumner said:—

"The two cases are quite distinct. Missionary Clergymen, or candidates for orders, are sent from here to the Colonial Bishops on the recommendation of the Society, which is therefore bound to ascertain the qualifications of those whom it so recommends; and has, at the same time, the means of ascertaining those qualifications through Examiners regularly appointed for the purpose. But a large proportion of the Colonial Clergy consists of persons resident in the Colonies themselves. The requisite supply of men for their increasing population could not otherwise be obtained. And in regard to these, the Society must trust to the local authorities. It has no means of appointing examiners in the several Colonies, and could not possibly impose such a Board upon the Colonial Bishop. The responsibility, therefore, must necessarily rest with the Bishop, by whom the candidates are to be ordained and stationed, of satisfying himself of their fitness for the post they are to occupy, and the duties they are to discharge. At the same time, the Society retains to itself the right, which it hopes never to have occasion to exercise, of excluding from its lists any of its Missionaries who may be found to be unworthy of its support" [23].

While continuing its invariable practice as to colonial candidates the Society, in order to secure all proper care and consideration as well as to guard itself against making grants which are really not needed, determined in 1854 to require of every Bishop recommending any Missionary for appointment a statement of various particulars [24]. [See p. 843.]

The regulations relating to the selection and appointment of Missionaries are now as follows:—

"No Missionary can be placed on the Society's list without an express resolution of the Society sanctioning his appointment and specifying the terms on which he is engaged. A Board of Examiners, consisting of five Clergymen, is appointed annually by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Bishop of London for the time being, to inquire into the fitness and sufficiency of all candidates who may present themselves in this country for Missionary appointments; and no candidate, so appearing, can be accepted by the Society without a recommendation in writing from the said Board. "It is in the power of any Colonial or Missionary Bishop, if he think fit, to act himself, or to appoint a Clergyman of the Church of England to act for him, as an additional Examiner of all candidates already in Holy Orders who may present themselves to the Society for a Missionary appointment in his diocese, provided that such additional Examiner shall be bound to conform to the rules laid down by the Board for their own guidance."

"In the case of a Missionary not sent from this country the Society requires a recommendation (unless under exceptional circumstances) from the Bishop of the Diocese in which the Missionary has resided for a year immediately preceding. But a Missionary may be provisionally appointed and paid from an unexpended grant by a Colonial Bishop and Committee pending a reference made immediately to the Society.

"When a Missionary, not having been sent by the Society from this country, is proposed to be placed on the Society's list, the following particulars are to be sent to the Society:—(1) Name of the Missionary. (2) Age. (3) Where educated. (4) Where, and in what work engaged during the last three years. (5) Married or single; Number of children. (6) References to Clergymen and others in this country to whom he may be known. (7) Proof of his competency to teach in any vernacular language required in his Mission. (8) Name of the Mission for which he is proposed. (9) Any other particulars which may assist the Society to form a correct judgment on the case.

"Every Missionary is appointed to a definite post assigned or sanctioned by the Society, and his salary for his services therein is secured to him for a year, and begins on his arrival at his Mission, and is renewable annually on application to the Society; but his engagement is terminable on three months' notice at the end of any year; or at any earlier time, with or without notice, for reasons approved by the Bishop or other ecclesiastical authority. Provided that no person who holds the Bishop's licence shall be removed from the list of the Society's Missionaries without the consent of the Bishop previously expressed, except on medical grounds certified by the Society's Honorary Consulting Physician.

"Every Missionary selected in this country is to proceed without delay to the country in which he is to be employed; and be subject, when there, to the Bishop or other ecclesiastical authority.

"Ordination.—No person is to be presented in behalf of the Society to a Bishop as a Candidate for Holy Orders, with a view to his employment among the heathen, without the special sanction of the Society.

"Before giving such sanction the Society requires to be supplied with the following information:—(1) Date and place of Candidate's birth. (2) His race. (3) His family (if any). (4) His education and previous history. (5) Certificate of his proficiency in any vernacular required in his Mission. (6) Position he is wanted to fill. (7) Amount of his proposed salary, and sources from whence it is derived. (8) A certificate from one or more of the Society's European Missionaries that the moral character of the Candidate is irreproachable, and that he or they believe the Candidate to be in all respects well fitted for Holy Orders" [25].

The course which the Society follows in making its Missionary appointments being in strict conformity with the principles of the Church of England, none are excluded from its service whom the Church would admit, and none admitted whom the Church would exclude [26].

Similarly in the management of its Missions, while regulations have been adopted to secure due administration of its grants, care has been taken not only to adapt them to the requirements of each country, but in all cases to disclaim for the Society any authority over its Missionaries in spiritual matters or any interference with the rights of the Bishops. The Bishop and local Committee are the ordinary channel of communication between the Society and the Missionaries. Quarterly reports with annual statistics are required of each Missionary, and those appointed specially for work among the heathen are required to pass two examinations in the vernacular language of the Mission within a limited period, and to abstain as much as possible from the performance of English duty [27]. (The necessity for this last rule is shown on p. 659.) During their visits to England the Missionaries are afforded opportunities of interviews with the Society [28]. The salaries allowed to the Missionaries from the Society's funds average about £50 in the case of Missions to the Colonists. In these cases as a general rule the Society's allowance does not exceed £100 per annum, nor twice the amount of the local contribution, nor one-half of the whole professional income of the Missionary. In heathen countries the European Missionaries generally are entirely supported by the Society [29], the salaries graduating from £120 to £360 per annum after about 25 years' service. These Missionaries are also provided by the Society with a house and with allowances for travelling and for the education of their children in England or abroad [30]. In 1874 a Committee was appointed to superintend the education, and the care during the holidays, of the children of Indian Missionaries sent to England [31], and by means of a Special Fund begun in 1877 a free education at excellent Schools has been secured for several boys, and many houses have been opened to receive children during the vacations [32, 33].

* This passage ("It" to "guidance") was the outcome (and the only one) of a conference between the Society and the Colonial and Missionary Bishops in 1877-9 as to what improvements could be made in the manner of selecting applicants for Missionary work [25a].

The salaries of the native pastors in India range from £18 to £140 per annum, it being a rule of the Society that in each instance a portion shall always be contributed by the congregation [34].

With respect to pensions, no general rule is laid down regarding the allowance to Missionaries who return home too ill to undertake any work; but the Society recognises the duty of affording assistance to those of its European Missionaries employed in tropical or unhealthy climates who, after long and faithful services in the Society's Missions, shall have become incapacitated by age or infirmity for a continuance of their labours, and who shall be destitute of other support. The Society considers and decides upon each case according to its own merits.*

In recent years, Missionaries of the Society and members of their families have been received at St. Luke's Hostel, 16 Nottingham Place, London, when ill, and the Society has every reason to be grateful for the treatment which they have received in that excellent institution. By the kindness of an anonymous donor, one of the houses forming part of the "Home of St. Barnabas" at East Grinstead was set apart in 1839 for the use of the Society's Missionaries.

A pension of £50 per annum is allowed to the widows of the European Missionaries in India remaining unmarried, and an allowance of £10 per annum for each orphan under sixteen years of age [35].

In 1874 £1,000 was reserved as a guarantee fund for helping in the life assurance of European Missionaries in tropical climates, specially those to whose widows there is no promise of pension [36], but the scheme has not been carried out.

The value and need of the "associated system" in Missions is becoming more and more recognised, not only for work among non-Christian peoples but also for work among scattered Europeans, and there are now several brotherhoods in the S.P.G. field [36a] (see the list on page 846b).

The Lay Agents employed by the Society consist of Schoolmasters, Schoolmistresses, Readers, and Catechists, two of these offices being often united in one person. [See pp. 769-74.] In 1706 were drawn up the following "Instructions for Schoolmasters employed by the Society, &c.

THAT they well consider the End for which they are employed by the Society, viz. The instructing and disposing Children to believe and live as Christians.

"II. In order to this End, that they teach them to read truly and distinctly, that they may be capable of reading the Holy Scriptures, and other pious and useful Books, for informing their Understandings, and regulating their Manners.

"III. That they instruct them thoroughly in the Church-Catechism; teach them first to read it distinctly and exactly, then to learn it perfectly by Heart; endeavouring to make them understand the Sense and Meaning of it, by the help of such Expositions as the Society shall send over.

"IV. That they teach them to write a plain and legible Hand, in order to the fitting them for useful Employments; with as much Arithmetick as shall be necessary to the same Purpose.

"V. That they be industrious, and give constant Attendance at proper School-Hours.

"VI. That they daily use, Morning and Evening, the Prayers composed for their Use in this Collection, with their Scholars in the School, and teach them the Prayers and Graces composed for their Use at Home.

"VII. That they oblige their Scholars to be constant at Church on the Lord's Day, Morning and Afternoon, and at all other Times of Publick Worship; that they cause them to carry their Bibles and Prayer Books with them, instructing them how to use them there, and how to demean themselves in the several Parts of Worship; that they be there present with them, taking Care of their reverent and decent Behaviour, and examine them afterwards, as to what they have heard and learned.

"VIII. That when any of their Scholars are fit for it, they recommend them to the Minister of the Parish, to be publickly Catechized in the Church.

"IX. That they take especial Care of their Manners, both in their Schools and out of them; warning them seriously of those Vices to which Children are most liable; teaching them to abhor Lying and Falshood, and to avoid all sorts of Evil-speaking; to love Truth and Honesty; to be modest, gentle, well-behaved, just and affable, and courteous to all their Companions; respectful to their Superiors, particularly towards all that minister in holy Things, and especially to the Minister of their Parish; and all this from a Sense and Fear of Almighty God; endeavouring to bring them in their tender Years to that Sense of Religion, which may render it the constant Principle of their Lives and Actions.

"X. That they use all kind and gentle Methods in the Government of their Scholars, that they may be loved as well as feared by them; and that when Correction is necessary, they make the Children to understand, that it is given them out of kindness, for their Good, bringing them to a Sense of their Fault, as well as of their Punishment.

"XI. That they frequently consult with the Minister of the Parish, in which they dwell, about the Methods of managing their Schools, and be ready to be advised by him.

"XII. That they do in their whole Conversation shew themselves Examples of Piety and Virtue to their Scholars, and to all with whom they shall converse.

"XIII. That they be ready, as they have Opportunity, to teach and instruct the Indians and Negroes and their Children.

"XIV. That they send to the Secretary of the Society, once in every six Months, an Account of the State of their respective Schools, the Number of their Scholars, with the Methods and Success of their Teaching [37].

[The following form appears in the "Standing Orders" of a later edition:—

Notitia Scholastica; or an Account to be sent every Six Months to the Society by each Schoolmaster, concerning the State of their respective Schools.
1. Attendance daily given.
2. Number of Children taught in the School.
3. Number of Children baptized in the Church of England .
4. Number of Indian and Negroe Children.
5. Number of Children born of Dissenting Parents.
6. Other Schools in or near the Place.
7. Of what Denomination.
8. Other Employments of the Schoolmaster.

"The Account to be attested by the Missionary (if any upon the Spot) and by some of the Principal Inhabitants."

The Testimonials required for Schoolmasters were similar to those for Missionaries, and equal care was shown in selecting men [38]. In 1712 an order was made that the Schoolmasters to be sent henceforth should be in deacon's orders [39], but as a matter of fact most of the scholastic agents employed by the Society have been obtained in the Colonies, &c. and the rule soon fell into disuse. The Catechists employed by the Society were originally, as now, intended for the Missions to the heathen, as is evident by the "Directions for Catechists for instructing Indians, Negroes, &c." [39a]. The first of those agents was engaged in 1704 for work among these races. See p. 769.] In the Mission to the Six-Nation Indians at Albany, native Mohawk Schoolmasters and Readers worked [p. 63, 73], and but for political troubles the Society might have succeeded in its endeavours to raise a large body of Indian teachers.

After the loss of the older colonies the establishment of schools throughout British North America called for a large body of teachers. How these were supplied is shown in Chapter XCV. [p. 769]. Many of the schoolmasters, especially in Newfoundland, were denominated Readers or Catechists, who read service to the people on Sundays. In some isolated places where daily schools were impossible, by a small grant from the Society some respectable person would be induced to conduct a Sunday School, and to read the Church Service to preserve among the people a regard for religion [39b]. For want of resources for the maintenance of a body of Clergy, the Society in 1830 sanctioned a proposal of the Bishop of Quebec to form a body of Catechists with superior qualifications licensed to act, as far as might be prudent, in place of clergymen. The effect produced by their employment in Upper and Lower Canada was beneficial, so far as their powers went, but the increased concern upon religious subjects produced by the Catechists created a corresponding sense of privation of those acts of the Ministry for which they were not competent [40]. During the next thirty years the employment of lay agents by the Society gradually ceased except in Missions to the heathen. For these, especially in India and Africa, there has been an ever-growing demand, difficult to supply at all times, but formerly more from dearth of suitable agents than, as now, from lack of means for their support [40a].

In 1897 the Standing Committee of the Society had an interview with a deputation from the "Student Volunteer Missionary Union," a body formed of students in Universities and Colleges throughout the world, who have taken as their watchword "The Evangelisation of the World in this Generation." Many of the students are members of the Anglican communion.* The Union had been commended by the Foreign Missions Committee of the Lambeth Conference of 1897, and the Standing Committee now expressed its gratitude to God "for the noble effort which is being made to promote the missionary spirit in Universities and Colleges, especially in leading young men and women to give their lives definitely to the work of the Foreign Mission-field," and commended the subject to the consideration of the Bishops assembled at the Lambeth Conference.

In 1899 the Union sought the co-operation of the Society, but, while sympathising with the objects proposed, the Committee regretted that they did not "see their way to identify the Society with their methods of procedure" [40b].

In 1900 the Society joined with the C.M.S. in urging on the Archbishops and Bishops that Missionary Science should be included in the scheme of examination for Holy Orders at home [40c].

WOMEN'S MISSION ASSOCIATION (1866-1900).

The idea of establishing a "Ladies' Association in behalf of the Society" was brought before the Standing Committee of the Society on March 29, 1866 (by the Rev. H. W. Burrows), approved by them on April 25,† and carried into effect at a meeting held at London House on May 11, 1866, when the Constitution‡ of the Association was formed, a provisional Committee was appointed to draw up Bye-laws, and the Officers of the Association, all of whom were honorary, were appointed.

The Society (May 18) granted the Association the use of its rooms (for meetings, &c.), and opened a special fund for receiving contributions in aid of its objects.

With the Society's consent the title of the Association, which had been "Ladies' Association for promoting the Education of Females in India and other Heathen Countries in connection with the Missions of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel," was altered in 1895 to "Women's Mission Association for the Promotion of Female Education in the Missions of the S.P.G."; and its Constitution and Bye-laws were amended, and its objects were thus defined:—(1) To provide Missionary teachers for the Christian instruction of native women and girls in such countries by supporting abroad, and selecting and preparing in this country, Church women well qualified for the work; (2) To assist female schools by providing suitable clothing and school materials, and a maintenance for boarders; (3) To employ other methods which may be suggested for promoting Christian education; (4) To assist generally in keeping up an interest in the work of the Society."

* The S.V.M.U. now numbers 1,670 volunteers for foreign service, of whom one-fourth are Churchmen.

† The original proposal by a Sub-Committee was that the Association should be "independent of but in connection with the Society": the words in italics were, however, not adopted.

‡ Drawn up by the Secretary of the Society, the Rev. W. T. Bullock.

In arranging for the raising of funds "not only by means of women's work, but also by establishing branch Associations throughout the country" it was from the first stipulated that care should be taken "in every instance that no Association shall divert or interfere with subscriptions to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel."

Annual subscribers are considered members of the Association.

The business of the Association is carried on by a Committee, consisting of the President and Vice-Presidents of the Association, twenty other ladies elected from the members, the Secretary, "and two members of the Standing Committee of the Society, with the Secretary of the Society" [41].

Commencing at Mauritius in 1867,* the operations of the Association were extended to India in 1868, South Africa 1870, Madagascar* 1873, Japan 1875, North China 1889 [42].

In 1897 the Association enlarged its sphere by the addition of medical work (see page 816c) [43].

Though independent of the Society as regards its funds, its method of work is to go hand-in-hand with the Society, going wherever the Society wishes it to go, and establishing no Mission Station without the approval and knowledge of the Standing Committee.†

Its work abroad resolves itself into teaching, nursing, doctoring, in schools and hospitals, and in private houses, by which means some 5,000 children are brought under instruction, and the women who are condemned to pass their lives in zenanas and harems receive offices of mercy and love which only ladies can perform. The Association has fifteen Zenana Missions in India, and altogether about 50 schools. Religious teaching is given in all the schools, and there are Training Colleges for Native teachers and boarding schools. The income of the Association has grown from £162 in 1866 to £10,672 in 1900, and the teachers now employed number 186, including 6 qualified Medical Missionaries [44].

First among the faithful women who (through the Association) have rendered "true and laudable service" unto God must be reckoned Miss Louisa Bullock, who both provided the Association with a home and served with unceasing zeal and devotion as Honorary Secretary for 26 years, accomplishing a work the magnitude of which was not fully realised until others entered into her labours. On Miss Bullock's resignation at the end of 1894 the office was removed from her private residence to the Society's house, 19 Delahay Street, Westminster, but the accommodation there is insufficient for the growing work of the Association. Miss Bullock's successors have been Mrs. G. Evans, 1895-6; and Miss Ethel Mackenzie, who has held office since 1896 [45].

The Association publishes its own Annual Report and its own monthly Magazine.‡

It remains to record the Society's thanks to the British and Foreign Bible Society, which since 1864 has generously granted to the Society and to the Women's Mission Association, £144 each, for the maintenance of twenty-four or more native Bible-women in India, whose work is to visit their ignorant sisters, and to read to them from the Holy Scriptures [46].

* The first Missionary of the Association, Miss Emily Lawrence, was intended for Madagascar, but owing to difficulties in the way of commencing work there it was necessary for her to spend her first seven years in Mauritius.

† In reply to an inquiry made by the W.M.A. in 1900, the Standing Committee decided that it is not open to the Association to hand over to any other body the work of its department and the buildings and property in an S.P.G. Mission such as Ahmadnagar. It should be added that the proposed transfer was not originated or supported by the W.M.A.

‡ The title of the magazine was in 1899 altered from "The Grain of Mustard Seed" to "Women's Work in the Mission Field."

LIST OF BROTHERHOODS IN THE S.P.G. FIELD. (See p. 844.)

(1) "The Cambridge Mission to Delhi in connection with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel." Formed in 1877. Consisting of members of the Cambridge University. Every member partly supported by the Society under a definite scheme (pp. 626-629*g*). A Branch Brotherhood was commenced at Rohtak in 1894.

(2 and 3.) (2) "The Dublin University Mission to Chhota Nagpur, working under the S.P.G." Formed in 1890-1 and located in the Hazaribagh district. Consisting of graduates of the University of Dublin, two of whom are qualified doctors. Every member partly supported by the Society under a definite scheme. Provision was made in 1893 for including associates and lady associates. (3) A Branch Brotherhood for Ranchi founded in 1901 (supported as in case of 2) (pp. 500*h-n*).

(4) A Brotherhood at Cawnpore in Lucknow Diocese. Formed in 1895. Supported by the Society (pp. 599*a-600*).

(5) An Augustinian Brotherhood for Roorkee in Lucknow Diocese. Founded in 1901. Supported by the Society (p. 603*a*).

(6) "St. Andrew's Mission" (Tokyo), "in connection with S.P.G.," aided by the Society from 1887 to 1891, and at the desire of the community reconnected, in 1900, on the Guild of St. Paul undertaking to pay each year to the Society "the whole of the expenses of the maintenance" of the Mission (pp. 724*c-g*).

(7) A branch of the "Society of the Sacred Mission," in Corea. Members aided from the S.P.G. grant to the diocese. The home work of this Society, begun in 1891 at Brixton, London, has been transferred to Mildenhall, Suffolk. Up to 1893 the community was known as the Corean Brotherhood, the first member of which arrived in Corea in 1892.*

(8) A Brotherhood at Antananarivo in Madagascar. Formed in 1899. Supported by the Society (pp. 380*a-d*).

(9) St. Cuthbert's Brotherhood, Tsolo, St. John's Diocese, Kaffraria. Formed in 1900. Members aided from the Society's grant to the diocese (p. 316*r*).

(10) St. Andrew's Brotherhood, Longreach, in the Diocese of Rockhampton, Queensland. Formed about 1897. Aided from the Society's grant to the diocese (p. 414*c*).

(11 and 12) There are also branches of the Lichfield Evangelist Brotherhood working in the Society's Missions in South Africa—one in the Diocese of Zululand (p. 345*b*) and one in Mashonaland (p. 366*l*)—but they have not sought direct or formal connection with the Society.

N.B. — In no instance has the Society anything to do with the internal working of the Brotherhoods.

* The Corean and Lebombo Missions as a whole are worked on community lines financially, but not so in other respects, excepting in the case of the S.S.M. in Corea.

SUMMARY OF THE MISSIONARY ROLL, 1701-1900 (see pp. 849-931c).

‡ After allowing for 109 repetitious and transfers.

Most of the information which follows, like that which precedes it, had hitherto been buried in the records of the Society; but, with the exception of an occasional biography, in no connected form. As it was not until 1717 that a regular list of agents began to be published, it had come to be regarded as impossible to give even the number of those previously employed; but former attempts would not have failed had the journals, the letters, and the accounts been analysed and compared. Every effort has been made to secure an accurate and complete list: besides the names of the earlier Missionaries, those of many others not before printed have been discovered, while some already printed have been omitted as not having actually come on the list; and in addition to the careful scanning of hundreds of volumes of printed matter, the MSS. have been liberally consulted, and the spelling of the names of the Missionaries of the 18th century, so much varied in print, has been verified from the original signatures. Notwithstanding, it has been impossible in many cases to obtain full particulars as to birth, education, ordination, location, and death, and additions and corrections will be welcomed. In this edition the identity of many more Missionaries as Irishmen has been established through information obtained from Trinity College, Dublin, by the kindness of the Rev. H. Vere White, while S.P.G. Organising Secretary for Ireland. Much difficulty has been experienced in identifying the native clergy in South India owing to diversity of rendering by the local authorities—e.g. (to say nothing of varied spelling), the same man would at one time be returned as "Abraham V." and at another as "Vedakan A.," and this without a word of explanation. The period of service is reckoned from the date of arrival at the station after ordination. Many of the Missionaries had previously been engaged as lay agents in the Missions. By arranging the Missionaries under the different countries in which they served the lists gain in historical value, and the alphabetical index of the whole (included in the general Index at the end of the book) supplies all the further reference necessary.

“WILLIAM THE THIRD, By the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith. To all Christian People, to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting

“Whereas Wee are credibly informed that in many of our Plantacons, Colonies, and Factories beyond the Seas, belonging to Our Kingdome of England, the Provision for Ministers is very mean. And many others of Our said Plantacons, Colonies, and Factories are wholly destitute, and unprovided of a Mainteynance for Ministers, and the Publick Worshipp of God; and for Lack of Support and Mainteynance for such, many of our Loveing Subjects doe want the Administration of God's Word and Sacraments, and seem to be abandoned to Atheism and Infidelity and alsoe for Want of Learned and Orthodox Ministers to instruct Our said Loveing Subjects in the Principles of true Religion, divers Romish Preists and Jesuits are the more encouraged to pervert and draw over Our said Loving Subjects to Popish Superstition and Idolatry

That a Maintenance for an Orthodox Clergy, and other Provision may be made for the Propagation of the Gospel in the Plautations beyond the Sea.

“And whereas Wee think it Our Duty as much as in Us lyes, to promote the Glory of God, by the Instrucon of Our People in the Christian Religion And that it will be highly conducive for accomplishing those Ends, that a sufficient Mainteynance be provided for an Orthodox Clergy to live amongst them, and that such other Provision be made, as may be necessary for the Propagation of the Gospell in those Parts :

“And whereas Wee have been well assured, That if Wee would be gratically pleased to erect and settle a Corporacon for the receiving, manageing, and disposing of the Charity of Our Loveing Subjects, divers Persons would be induced to extend their Charity to the Uses and Purposes aforesaid

His Majesty Incorporates the Archbishop of Canterbury and 93 others by the Name of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

NOTES ON THE CHARTERS (pp. 932-8) AND ON THE CONSTITUTION AND FUNCTIONS OF THE SOCIETY AND ITS STANDING COMMITTEE.

The circumstances under which the Society's original Charter of June 16, 1701 (p. 932), was granted by William III., are related on pages 4 to 6.	Charter of 1701.
Archbishop Tenison was forward in "promoting the passing" of the Charter (p. 6), and was the first to subscribe (£20) towards the "charges," amounting to £159. 9s. 6d. (pp. 5, 822). The S.P.C.K. undertook to advance "the moneys wanting," and actually advanced £20 (p. 6). The Archbishop also bore the cost of the 1st edition of the Charter (500 copies), which was printed under the superintendence of Serjeant Hook and Mr. Comyns, who arranged it in paragraphs, and added marginal notes (pp. 813, 822, 932).	Its Cost. Its Printing.
The original members appointed by the Charter consisted of the 2 ARCHBISHOPS (Canterbury and York), 9 BISHOPS (London, Worcester, Ely, Rochester, Gloucester, Chichester, Chester, Bath and Wells, and Bangor), 3* DEANS (St. Paul's, Westminster, and Canterbury), 3 ARCHDEACONS (London, Colchester, and Durham), the 2 Regius, and the 2 Margaret Professors of Divinity at Oxford and Cambridge, 32 other CLERGYMEN, 4 PEERS, 5 BARONETS, 7 KNIGHTS, 2 "DOCTORS OF PHISICK," 20 ESQUIRES (including representatives of the legal profession), and 4 MERCHANTS—in all 94* persons. Of these, the following were members in perpetuum, viz.:—The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of London and Ely, the Lord Almoner and Dean of Westminster the Dean of St. Paul's and Archdeacon of London, and the two Regius and two Margaret Professors of Divinity of Oxford and Cambridge Universities "for the time being" (pp. 932-3).	Original Members 94 : 52 Clerical and 42 Lay. Members in Perpetuum.
The S.P.C.K. was represented in the original list by most of its own members at the time (p. 6).	S.P.C.K. element.
Among other distinguished persons elected during the next 20 years were Robert Nelson† (author of "Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England," &c., elected 21 Nov., 1701) and John Evelyn‡ (elected 15 May, 1702) [1], and over 40 representatives of the Reformed Churches of the Continent of Europe. The admission of these Foreign Honorary Members was due to the "fraternal Correspondence" between the Society and the Reformed Churches (p. 734), which inspired and stimulated the noble efforts of the Lutherans in India in the beginning of the last century (pp. 468-9, 471-2, 501-3).	R. Nelson and J. Evelyn. Foreign Honorary Members.
During the first 100 years the number of living members never reached 300 [2], and in 1819, the number then being 320, it was thought "expedient in conformity with" (what at that time was considered to be) "the Spirit and Intent of the Charter," to suspend the election of new members "for the present, except in the case of Persons already proposed, and of any of the Bishops of England and Ireland. . ." [3].	Number of Members Limited.
For the purpose of "extending the beneficial operations of the Society," it was further resolved (at the same meeting) to admit subscribers under the denomination of "Associated Members," and "from them only" to fill up vacancies occurring in the Corporate Body, with whom the government of the Society remained [4].	Associated Members.
In 1830 the number of Incorporated Members was definitely limited to 300, exclusive of the Bishops [5]. The limitation was entirely removed in 1850 [6], and, as a result, the number of members reached 1,980 by the year 1866, 4,300 in 1877, and 6,000 in 1900, including the Vice-Presidents [7].	Restrictions Removed. Increase of Members.
Under the regulations of its ancient Charter, the Society's action was much hampered by the anomalies accumulating in the course of time, but such inconveniences increased more rapidly as the Corporation added to its roll [8].	Inconveniences under Original Charter.

† In 1887-8 the Society promoted the raising of a fund for restoring Robert Nelson's tomb in the burial ground of St. George the Martyr, Bloomsbury [1a].

‡ Evelyn's diary contains the following reference: "Being elected a member of the Society lately incorporated for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, I subscribed £10 per annum towards the carrying it on. We agreed that every missionary, besides the £20 to set him forth, should have £50 per annum out of the stock of the Corporation till his settlement was worth to him £100 per annum. We sent a young divine to New York."

After fruitless discussions and efforts in the years 1868-71 and 1879 [9], a large Special Committee was appointed in February 1880, to "consider whether any, and if any, what, changes should be made in the constitution of the Society." Their Report (July 16, 1880) after having been for seven months in the possession of the Incorporated Members, was discussed at the largely-attended Annual Meeting held at Willis' Rooms on February 18, 1881, and in consequence of the Resolutions then adopted a Supplemental Charter was obtained from the Crown on April 6, 1882 (the cost being £189. 4s. 6d., of which £106. 16s. 6d. were the Crown Office charges) [10]. The immediate result was the equalisation of the governing power vested in each member. Under the original Charter no member had any power unless personally present at the Monthly Meetings, but under the Supplemental Charter every member, wherever resident in the United Kingdom, is able by a system of voting* papers, to make his influence felt on any subject which may be referred to the whole Corporation. The Standing Committee, which since its appointment in 1702 (p. 7) had been subject to "the Society," was now made the Executive of the Society, except in regard to certain reserved matters; and the Archbishop of Canterbury became President ex-officio, and the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of England and Wales Vice-Presidents ex-officio. The "oath" prescribed in the original Charter, for the President and other officers, had been superseded in 1836 by a "declaration," which was abolished in 1850 (p. 7); nevertheless, any test of the kind "henceforth" (from 1882) was now actually forbidden. Among other advantages secured by the Supplemental Charter was the provision made for the removal and the voluntary resignation of members,† and for the purchase or holding of lands of the annual value of £10,000 [11].

"The Society" now comprises about 6,000 Incorporated Members [12], of whom the Lord Almoner and Dean of Westminster, the Dean of St. Paul's and Archdeacon of London, and the two Regius and two Margaret Professors of Divinity of Oxford and Cambridge Universities are Members ex-officio (p. 932). The officers of the Society consist of: (a) a PRESIDENT, viz., the Archbishop of Canterbury ex-officio; (b) VICE-PRESIDENTS, viz., the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of the Church of England holding Sees in England and Wales ex-officio; and (the following, elected annually) the Archbishops and Bishops of the Dioceses in Ireland, the Bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church; the Colonial, Indian, and Missionary Archbishops and Bishops and Coadjutor-Bishops of the Anglican Church in Foreign Parts; the Retired Bishops and Coadjutor-Bishops of the Anglican Church; and about 50 distinguished Clergymen and Laymen at home [12a]. (c) HONORARY ASSOCIATES—the Bishops of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America. The order is intended for "persons who may have promoted, or whose co-operation may be deemed to promote, the designs of the Society, whether they be British subjects or not." It was instituted in 1868, but up to the present time the only Associates elected have been the American Bishops (see p. 83). Associates have liberty to attend the Board Meetings, but without the right of voting [13]. (d) A SECRETARY and two Assistant Secretaries; (e) FOUR TREASURERS (Honorary); (f) AUDITORS (now paid); (g) A BOARD OF EXAMINERS (Honorary, see p. 842); (h) an HONORARY CONSULTING PHYSICIAN [14] (who examines candidates in England for Missionary work abroad, also Missionaries on their return to England (see p. 942) [15]. (For the Standing Committee see next page.)

The MEETINGS of "the Society" (Incorporated Members) are held at the Society's office, at 2 p.m., on the third Friday in every month, excepting Good Friday, and August and September, when there are no meetings; seven members, in addition to the President or a Vice-President, form a quorum [16 and 17]. The Annual Meeting is in February, when officers are elected. (There is also an Annual Public Meeting, generally in St. James's Hall, in April, May, or June.)

* The desirableness of adopting this system formed the subject of a memorial to the Society from 64 of the Cornish members in 1871 [11a]. (See first Poll, p. 942.)

† Though no provision for removal or resignation can be found in the original Charter it is interesting to note that in 1716 a Standing Order was made "That all members as are three years or more in arrear" (with their subscriptions) "shall not have a voice in deciding any question relating to the Society at any Meetings of the Society, or any Committee thereof" [11b]; and that (whether legally or not) the Society exercised the power of dismissing a member in one instance at least, as recorded on p. 198.

The election of Incorporated Members is by ballot at the monthly meetings, the following being the qualifications for membership:—

"(a) A Donation of ten guineas or upwards in a single payment; or,

"(b) An annual subscription of not less than one guinea to the General Fund of the Society—two such annual subscriptions at least to have been paid before the candidate is eligible for election; or,

"(c) To be an incumbent of a parish, or a curate in charge, who shall have in his parish an association in aid of the Society, or an annual collection, and who remits to the General Fund of the Society not less than two guineas annually."

These qualifications are not necessary in the case of persons recommended by the Standing Committee "on the ground of important services rendered to the Society at home or abroad" [18].

The FUNCTIONS specially reserved for "the SOCIETY" since the Charter of 1882 are:—

(A) Granting leases; (B) altering or affixing or using the Seal of the Society; (C) choosing officers; (D) electing members of the Corporation; (E) laying down the conditions and manner in which the resignation of any member of the Corporation desirous of resigning may be made and accepted; (F) declaring any member of the Corporation disqualified who shall not fulfil the conditions as to subscribing or as to payment or collections as from time to time may be laid down; (G) transacting any business which from time to time by any bye-law or resolution made or passed after April 6, 1882, shall be specially reserved for the Society; (H) making, varying, or repealing any bye-law or resolution of the Society [19].

The STANDING COMMITTEE (which in 1882 became the Executive of the Society) now consists of (a) ex-officio members, viz., the President, Vice-Presidents, Treasurers, and Secretary of the Society; (b) twenty-four members elected by the Society out of its Incorporated Members (six retiring annually); (c) Diocesan Representatives—two for each Diocese in England and Wales, and four for each of the Provinces (Armagh and Dublin) in Ireland. The Representatives are now elected by and from the resident Incorporated Members, Vice-Presidents and paid officers of the Society not being eligible [20].

The system of Diocesan Representation was introduced in 1872 "with a view to give the Country Members of the Society a more distinct voice in the management of the Society's affairs, and to encourage their interest in Missionary work" [21], and the Representatives (who may be two clergymen or two laymen, or one of each order) are now elected for a period of three years [22] (see foot note*).

* The first election (C. L. Higgins, Esq., and Rev. F. Bathurst) was made by the ELZ Diocesan Conference, and confirmed by the Society on July 19, 1872 [22a]. The first WELSH election (the Rev. W. Feetham, for Llandaff Diocese) was confirmed in February 1880 [22b], and the first IRISH elections (8 Representatives) were reported simultaneously in February 1885 [22c]. LONDON's first "Diocesan Representatives" were the Rev. W. Panckridge and the Rev. J. H. Snowden, reported in February 1883 [22d]. The stages of development of the system were as follows:—

1872-74.—Vice-Presidents were eligible, but not paid officers of the Society; and in dioceses where "any Representative Church Body" met "periodically" under the presidency of the Bishop, such "Body" was "invited to select" from the Incorporated Members resident in the diocese "a Clergyman and a Layman." Where no such "Body" existed, the Incorporated Members were "invited" to make the selection "by some method to be approved in each case by the Standing Committee." The elections were annual, and subject to the "concurrence of the Bishop," and to "confirmation by the Society at a Monthly Meeting" [22e].

1875-81.—The Incorporated Members in each diocese were "at liberty to select," before the Annual Meeting of the Society (February), and in such manner as they should determine, "two of their own body, not being Vice-Presidents or paid officers of the Society." The elections were for three years, and still "subject to confirmation by the Society," but at the "Annual Meeting" [22f].

1882-93.—Up to 1882 the electors had been referred to as "Country Members" or Members "dispersed throughout the country," but in that year the area was expressly limited to "England and Wales," and it was laid down that the Incorporated Members "shall elect," and by means of voting papers. But residence in diocese was not stated to be necessary on the part of candidates, and the elections were simply to be reported to the Society at the Annual Meeting [22g]. In 1884 the system was extended to Ireland, but there the Members elect four Representatives for each of the two Provinces (Armagh and Dublin) [22h]. In 1893 residence in the diocese (or Province in the case of Ireland) was again expressly stated to be essential [22i].

Election of Members. Qualifications required.

Society's Functions.

Standing Committee Constitution. Diocesan Representatives.

Acting "both as delegates from their Diocese to the Standing Committee and as delegates from the Committee to their Diocese," these Representatives (as pointed out by the Committee) "have it in their power to promote the work of the Church abroad in a manner and to a degree which are shared by no others" [23].

Functions of Standing Committee

The FUNCTIONS of the STANDING COMMITTEE do not include those specially reserved for the Society (see A to H on p. 941); but otherwise "the management of the affairs of the Society" is "entrusted" to the Committee, the Committee have "all rights powers and privileges" of the Society granted by the Charters of 1701 and 1882, and "such further or other powers" of the Society ("including those herein before excepted") "as the Society shall from time to time by any bye-law or resolution ordain and appoint," saving "the power of making varying or repealing any bye-law or resolution of the Society," which power the Committee "shall not at any time have" (pp. 936-7).

Meetings
and Quorum
Sub-Committees.

The Standing Committee meet about twice a month (the hour being 2.30 p.m.) [23a], and ten members form a quorum [23b]. Most of the business is prepared by Sub-Committees, viz., (1) India; (2) The Straits, China, Corea, Japan, and the Pacific; (3) Africa, Mauritius, and Madagascar; (4) America (North, Central, and South) and the West Indies; (5) Europe (Continent of); (6) Home Organisation; (7) Intercession (for Missions); (8) Missionaries' Children's Education; (9) Finance and Accounts; (10) Applications [24].

On most of the Sub-Committees for Foreign business the Society has the advantage of having some gentlemen possessing personal knowledge of the country. To the Applications Sub-Committee are referred all applications from abroad for the renewal of existing grants or for additional grants. All such applications received in the year are fully considered at one and the same time (generally in May), when grants are made with due regard to the comparative merits and urgency of each case; and thus equal justice is secured all round, which would not be possible were each case to be considered alone and without regard to the claims of the whole.

Society's
Meetings
Improved.

Thus relieved of much of dry business details, and "matters which can never be advantageously managed in a large assembly," the Monthly Meetings of the Society have become more distinctly missionary in their spirit and in their doings [25]. The formal business to be transacted seldom now occupies much time, and the chief interest centres in the excellent addresses delivered by Missionaries [26].

The election of six members to fill vacancies on the Standing Committee in 1894 was the occasion of a poll being taken of the whole Society (by means of voting papers) for the first—and as yet (1900) the only—time since the Supplemental Charter of 1882 made such an appeal possible (see p. 940). The result was that the six nominees of the Committee were elected by overwhelming majorities [27].

The office of Honorary Physician (see p. 940) was resigned by Dr. J. W. Ogle in 1900, after thirty-three years of "valuable services" given "ungrudgingly to the Church at large, and specially to the work of the Society," whose "confidence, gratitude, and respect" he had won.* In his dedication of "Some Elements of Religion" to Dr. Ogle, the late Canon Liddon said: "his work and character suggest many precious lessons which he never thinks of teaching." This was fully exemplified in his relations with the Society. His successor, Dr. N. C. Macnamara, F.R.C.S., appointed on October 19, 1900, resigned in 1901 [28].

* Resolution of the Society, October 19, 1900, on his resignation.

THE SOCIETY'S HOUSE, 19, DELAHAY STREET, WESTMINSTER.

Office Hours, 10 to 5 (Saturdays 10 to 2).

A Short Service is held daily in the Chapel at 10.5 a.m.
